Everything that a repair facility does on today's automobile has the potential to set a fault code (DTC) or digital fingerprint. Even simply realigning a mirror or door handle may set a fault code. The post repair scanning process can help determine whether or not the repair process has been completed properly and safely. It's at this point where a technician is able to clear any codes that were originally set during the collision or that may have been added through any touch points.
