If one were to imagine an ideal ethnography of a commodity, one might envision Jinghong Zhang's Puer Tea: Ancient Caravans and Urban Chic. A "cultural biography" in the Kopytoffian sense (1986), or a "social history" in a more popular sense, Zhang's book considers how identity, history, and cachet (or "urban chic") infuse Puer, examining the contexts and conditions of categorization, custom, and commercialization.
